

A Unified Account of Plural different Depending on Plural NPs and Coordinate Structures

David Lahm

In both all games attracted different children and different children sang and played, the adjective different can have an internal reading. Under this reading, the first sentence expresses that the sets of children attracted were distinct for distinct games and the second expresses that the set of children who sang is distinct from the set of children who played. In the first sentence, different depends on the quantified plural DP. In the second sentence, it depends on the coordinate structure.

I propose an analysis of different depending on coordinate structures that builds upon and modifies an existing analysis for NP-dependent different couched in Lexical Resource Semantics. It employs a (to my knowledge) novel account of coordination as quantification over indices of the coordinated constituents and thus allows for capturing both readings with a single lexical entry for different.
