1 Gender-inclusive language

Use gender-inclusive language, following the recommendations of the Linguistics Society of America. This is important both in your text and in your example sentence!

Download the recommendations from:

2 Linguistic examples

2.1 . . . within the text

- Examples within the text are marked in italics:

    The words walk and talk are both verbs. While walk expresses an event of walking, talk refers to an event of talking.

- All non-English examples need to be translated:

    The expression Hallo, wie geht's? 'Hello, how are you?' can be used in almost all greeting contexts in German, except for highly formal ones.

2.2 . . . with numbering

Examples can be set apart by numbering. Whenever you use a numbered example, it needs to be taken up in the text.

The examples in (1) show different ways of talking about a person.

(1)    a.    Alex is a nice person.
       b.    Alex is a nice guy.

While the expression person used in (1-a) is rather neutral, the term guy in (1-b) has a more informal flavor to it.

The numbers given to examples must be unique in the text, i.e., there can only be one example (1).

3 Providing references

3.1 ...in the text

- Always give the name(s) of the author(s) AND the year (even if there is just one paper with these authors in the references!). Whenever possible give the page number.

- NEVER!!! give full references in the text (or in footnotes). Full references appear at the end of the paper.

- Only mention papers that you have REALLY seen. NEVER!!! quote someone following someone else's quote—linguistics is not about hearsay!
  Rather: Check the original source to see whether it has been quoted correctly—and, maybe, find that the next sentence in the original source is much better suited for your purpose!

- Try to avoid quotations. Your text should not be a "collage" from other texts, but an independent text.

- If you summarize what someone else has said, you indicate this clearly at the beginning of your summary:

  > In the following, I will go through the design features of natural language as they are presented in Mihalicek & Wilson (2011:17–23). The authors name 9 features, ...

- A short direct quote is given in quotation marks, preceded or followed by authors, year, and page number.

  > Mihalicek & Wilson (2011:409) define a speech community as "a group of people speaking the same dialect".
  > A speech community can be defined as "a group of people speaking the same dialect" (Mihalicek & Wilson, 2011:409) .

- Longer quotes are set apart by indentation. The example also shows that quotes need to be introduced and motivated. Don't let the quotation speak for itself, but tell the reader what the quotation is good for, i.e. which purpose it has in your argumentation. Also: Even if there is a quotation, you should still summarize the aspect that is important for you in your own words.

  > The following quote from a text book shows that in addition to learning basic facts about language and linguistics, applying linguistic methods oneself and raising awareness for linguistic phenomena is a central goal in teaching modern linguistics.
  > > We hope to lead you [the learner, M.S.] to examine your own beliefs and attitudes about language, to make you more aware of the diversity of language systems as well as their fundamental similarities, and to introduce you to some of the applications of linguistic investigation. (Mihalicek & Wilson, 2011:5)

3.2 ...at the end of the text

Follow the standard for referencing exemplified in linguistic papers, seminar handouts etc. (including this very handout).
Over the past few years, the Unified Style Sheet for Linguistics has become the most common standard in linguistics (which is also the style used in this handout). It is available at:
